Marriage counseling tips pdf

I'm not robot!

If you and your spouse have decided to go to marriage counseling, you are most likely hoping to see positive changes in your relationship. There are several things you can do in order to get the most out of your counseling experience. Seven of these helpful marriage counseling tips are as follows: Tip 1: Both of you must be emotionally engaged If one or both of you has checked out emotionally and is not willing to take responsibility for your problems, then counseling is pointless. Going for marriage counseling is a purely voluntary step to take, and if you are there unwillingly, just to pacify your partner, you are unlikely to have a positive result. To enhance your emotional connection you can always try to be more empathetic and practice active listening. Without emotional engagement, any relationship would wither away with time. However, there are numerous ways to reconnect with your partner. And a qualified marriage counselor can help you achieve that. Tip 2: Take responsibility for your actions Certainly, your counselor will be understanding and compassionate, but their main priority is to help you do the hard work required to improve your marriage. You don't want to be in a relationship where one partner is always looking down and feeling sorry for another. It makes more sense to acknowledge your faults and ask for help from your partner. Tip 3: Learn to listen carefully Although counseling is your opportunity to talk and be heard, it is also important that you listen and hear what your spouse is sharing, perhaps for the first time. Sometimes one partner is used to doing all the talking, and when they get into a counseling situation they may be surprised to hear their spouse share deep feelings they may have never felt free to share before. Actively listening is essential for any relationship. Asking questions, checking back to confirm if you have understood the other person correctly will help you and your partner improve your overall communication. Listening carefully to a conversation with your partner is one of the best couples counseling tips for any couple. Not only can active listening help you defuse an emotionally tense situation, it can also help you turn challenges into co-operative situations. Tip 4: Don't be too hard on yourself Everyone makes mistakes, so it's best to accept it. Accept responsibility and see how you can learn from your past experiences to improve in the future. Also, be careful not to beat yourself up for mistakes that you have made because that can add more stress to you and your relationship. The role of guilt in a relationship is to motivate you to make different choices the next time around and with the goal to stop criticizing yourself after you have made corrections. Some of the best marriage counseling advice focuses on empathizing with yourself in your marriage. Everyone makes mistakes and you should offer yourself the same degree of understanding and compassion that you would to your partner. When you visit a counselor to discuss and resolve your relationship issues, you are provided with a platform wherein you and your partner can express emotions and feelings in a safe environment. Discussing your feelings during a therapy session can escalate conflict at times and might turn into an argument between you and your partner. Although arguing may not be the best way of communicating with your spouse, an argument between a couple helps the counselor to see the dynamic that is operating between the both of you, and help you to gain a better understanding of each other's feelings. Tip 6: Leave the past in the past If something happened many years ago, don't bring it up now. Rather stick to the topic at hand. An essential part of any marriage is being able to forgive each other and move on. Any marriage counselor would give marriage counseling tips that would advise you to bury the hatchet if it has been too long. To enhance the future of your marriage you need to focus more at the present and not be bogged down by the instances in the past. If a significant amount of time has gone by and you have made peace with the issue, now you should concentrate on the issues at hand and try resolving them to build a happier and stronger marriage. Tip 7: Don't expect the counselor to tell you what to do The counselor cannot give you all the answers or tell you what to do. No one can do that for you. It is the counselor's role to give you a clearer perspective on your situation and help you to explore options for finding a better way forward in your relationship. The end result of your couples' counseling is ultimately determined by you, although your therapist will also share their ideas of your progress. A therapist is an individual who observes your relationship and helps you to resolve your marital issues. You and your spouse would have to do the heavy lifting by reflecting, communicating, and taking responsibilities through the course of your counseling. Counseling is one way to self reflect on you and your relationship and a counselor is a person who brings the mirror for you. How you want to look at it is entirely up to you. Frequently Asked Questions (FAQ's) How Do I Succeed In Marriage Counseling? To succeed in couples therapy or marriage counseling, you and your partner must be invested in the process. You must be committed to putting effort into counseling. This will mean a variety of things. First, it means putting effort into showing up. Then, it means being vulnerable enough to open up to a therapist or counselor, both individually and as a couple. You and your spouse will have to talk to one another and might have to have some hard conversations in counseling, depending on what you're there for. You must be honest. If something is on your mind that relates to your partnership and it weighs on you, you need to talk about it. It will hold you back both in therapy and in the success of your relationship if you don't talk about what's going on internally. For example, if you have a fear of being "needy" and it makes you afraid to talk about your needs in counseling, that something to move toward. We all have needs, and there's nothing to be ashamed of in couples therapy. A marriage counselor or marriage therapist is there to be an objective third-party that helps you and your partner navigate things productively and work through any issues you might have. Counseling is an excellent place to talk about things that you've been nervous to verbalize. It is a safe space where you are there to strengthen the bond you have with your partner and work through anything you have going on that affects your relationship. What Is The Success Rate Of Couples Counseling? Research shows that over 90% of couples who received couples therapy are happy with the care that they got. EFT or emotionally focused therapy, a common modality used in couples counseling, boasts a 70-75% success rate. 90% of those surveyed said that it helped at least to some extent, whereas the aforementioned 70-75% considered their relationship to be in recovery after therapy. You can get couples counseling in person or online through a therapy web site. Whether you see someone face to face or remotely depends on a number of factors, including your preferences and requirements. Online therapy is often cheaper than traditional face to face therapy, but it allows you to see a licensed mental health provider such as a licensed marriage and family therapist from the privacy of your own home. To find more information about online therapy at ReGain, check the FAQ section of our website or go to the start page. What To Say In Couples Counseling? Again, it's vital to be honest in couples counseling or couples therapy. Most couples see couples therapists or marriage therapists with some sort of idea as to what they want to talk about in therapy. It could be that you want to see a couples therapist to work through a disagreement that you have on a regular basis, especially one that feels like a dealbreaker, parenting issues, concerns related to trust or cheating, intimacy issues, or something else. In some cases, you might go to a counseling session after a particular issue arises. When this happens, it can provide you with a lot of insight. For example, if it's valentine's day and your spouse forgets or acts like they don't care and hurts your feelings, you can take the initiative to talk about it. You can say, "when this happened on valentine's day, I felt like I wasn't receiving love." There are times when your partner may hurt you without realizing it, either due to personal differences or just missing something. Personal differences don't mean that you can't work things through. It just means that you could benefit from learning about how each other clicks. It's important not to be heavily critical of your spouse. When you don't understand something, work to gain perspective on it. Of course, you always get to decide what your deal breakers are and what your boundaries are. However, with more trivial things, it's often a matter of needing communication or development in understanding one another. What Can I Get Out Of Marriage Counseling? Marriage counseling should give you and your partner skills and tools that you can use throughout the course of your marriage moving forward. You're not going to be in couples therapy forever. It's typically rather short term. What marriage counseling or couples therapy is meant to do is to give you sustainable methods and modalities to use yourself outside of therapy. Of course, you can always go back to therapy to learn more. Sometimes, individuals or couples go to counseling, stop going to counseling, and then come back. The ball is in your court in marriage counseling. You can talk about any issues you and your partner are going through and anything that affects your relationship either as a couple or on an individual level. If you would like to talk about your sex life specifically, you might consider going to a sex therapist with your partner. The type of therapy you decide on will depend heavily on you and your partner, as will what you get out of the experience. What Should I Expect From My First Marriage Counseling Session? Your first marriage counseling session will generally consist of your therapist or counselor asking you a series of questions. You will tell your new counselor or therapist about who you are and why you're there. Likely, during the first session, things won't get too heavy. You will just provide an overview of your relationship, what brings you to therapy, and perhaps some of your goals for therapy or counseling. You'll reevaluate goals throughout the counseling process to make sure you're getting the most out of the experience. To find more information about what you can get from a specific mental health provider, it's best to ask them. Some marriage therapists specialize in particular therapy modalities that they use to work with couples. Additionally, every therapist will have a different demeanor and personality, which can make a difference. Does Counseling Really Help Marriages? Many couples find marriage counseling effective and beneficial. Statistics indicate that just over 97% of couples who seek marriage counseling got the assistance they were looking for. Counselors and therapists who work with couples are well-versed in relationships sex marriage family and other issues. When looking for a marriage therapist, Take note of if there is anything specific that would make you feel comfortable in therapy. For example, if you're religious, it might make you feel comfortable to have a therapist who aligns with your beliefs. You might also look for someone who utilizes a specific therapeutic modality. In some cases, individual counseling might be a better fit for your needs. For example, if you find yourself struggling with symptoms of anxiety depression, or eating disorders and want counseling one-on-one to focus on concerns related to the condition, you may look for someone who works with individuals rather than couples. Eating disorders can be tricky to spot; if you find yourself preoccupied with health fitness or weight loss to the point that it's detrimental to your wellbeing, it's important to seek help from a licensed provider. The same is true for if you notice symptoms of another mental health condition in yourself, or if you are struggling in general and have a hard time coping with it on your own. People don't just go to counseling for relationship issues or mental health conditions. You can also go to therapy to address stress, work, school, familial issues, identity, or anything else. Counseling is your safe space to talk about whatever's on your mind. In some cases, people might go to both marriage counseling and individual therapy. You can also decide to attend group therapy or a support group. When Should You Consider Couples Counseling? If you want to save your marriage or current relationship, couples counseling is a great way to go. However, wanting to save your marriage isn't the only reason that you might go to couples counseling. People go to couples counseling or therapy for a wide range of reasons. Here are some scenarios in which you may consider couples counseling: Frequent arguments Communication issues Trust problems Trouble understanding each other Wanting to support your spouse with a personal matter (or vice versa) Infidelity Family planning Preparing for marriage Wondering how to put the spark back into your relationship or wanting to save your marriage Ultimately, there are infinite reasons you might go to counseling, and there's no wrong reason to go to couples counseling. Whether you have a happy marriage or one that's on the rocks, there are ways to benefit from the therapeutic process. You might go to couples counseling to learn about conflict resolution skills, communication, or to improve your relationship overall. With social distancing due to the coronavirus, a lot of people are deciding to go to couples therapy or marriage therapy remotely. You can go through an online therapy service or work with a provider in your local area who offers remote sessions if you're interested in remote therapy. What Is The Difference Between Marriage Counseling And Couples Therapy? There are multiple kinds of couples therapy, and marriage counseling or marriage therapy is one of them. The term couples therapy could encompass a number of things. For example, An unmarried couple might seek couples counseling in the form of premarital counseling, or a married couple may seek couples counseling together. When people refer to marriage therapy or marriage therapists, they are typically referring to forms of therapy or marriage therapists that work with married couples. However, a licensed marriage and family therapist can work with anyone, whether it's in individual counseling, couples therapy marriage counseling, or family therapy. It all depends on what their specialty is and what populations they work with as a unique provider. If the first marriage counselor or a couples therapist you see doesn't work for you, it is okay to switch. Sometimes, the first counselor or therapist you see, whether they're a marriage counselor or an individual counselor, won't be the right fit, and that's okay. Whether you work with someone in person or online, you can find a provider that makes a difference in your life. You deserve a happy marriage, and counseling can help.
